14 Web-Based Jobs You Might Be Interested In

Wouldn’t it be wonderful to roll out of bed and instantly be at work without a lengthy commute or hours spent on getting ready? More and more people are working from home these days either remotely for companies or as freelance workers.

According to one survey of 15,000 people, about 43 percent of Americans work at home at least some of the work week. Working from home has a number of advantages, including saving money on your wardrobe, commuting costs and lunches out. At the same time, it can be challenging due to distractions, so make sure you’re prepared for the time commitment before taking on a remote position.

If you’ve already thought it over and you’re sure you want a web-based job you can do from the comfort of your own home office, here are 14 that might interest you.

1. Web Designer

As a web designer, you can either work freelance from your own home office or secure a remote position with a company. Web design has many different facets, and it’s smart to specialize in an area or two, such as user experience (UX) design.

While you don’t technically need a formal education to become a web designer, some knowledge of coding and training in the aesthetics of design will help you build your career.

2. Writer

If you have skill with the written word, look into writing as a full-time career. Many companies hire writers to create content for their websites. You can either collect a number of small business clients or find a company that needs full-time writers.

Degrees in related areas such as education, English and journalism are helpful so that you understand proper grammar and how to put together a story.

3. Cyber Security

As more and more businesses go online and conduct their business there, cybersecurity needs grow. By the year 2024, security analyst jobs are expected to increase by 18 percent.

The majority of work in cybersecurity requires a bachelor’s degree and even some advanced training beyond that. It’s vital that you fully understand how the backend of networks operate and what you need to do to protect companies from external attacks.

4. Medical Coding

You’ve likely heard that you can do medical coding from home. That’s true, but many people start with a local hospital and then work their way into a remote job.

Medical coding pays fairly well, and you can get into it by completing certification. You’ll have to pass a test to show that you know all the codes needed. Be aware that the coding system changes, so you’ll also need to stay up-to-date on training over time.

5. Social Media Marketer

Do you have a knack for social media and a background in marketing? Social media marketing is a position that can be done from home. Similar to writing, smaller companies may require only a part-time marketer, so you may need to work for several companies to reach full-time income status.

Make sure you have a background in marketing and that you understand the details of each social media platform and its typical audience.

6. Virtual Assistant

Are you highly organized? Consider working as a virtual assistant. The work for this type of position is highly varied. You might answer emails for a CEO one day and transcribe a recorded meeting another day. You might have a client who needs you to send out notices to their customers the next week.

You'll need to be extremely organized and have a wide range of clerical skills to do this type of work.

7. Language Translator

The median pay for interpreters and translators is $47,190 per year. The typical education is a bachelor's degree, and you'll of course need to read, write and speak fluently in the languages you'll translate. Because this type of work isn't something companies typically need every day, you'll probably work as a freelancer running your own business.

8. Online Teacher/Tutor

Do you love to teach others? A job as an online teacher or tutor is an excellent option. Be aware that if you plan to teach English to other countries, you'll likely be required to work hours that make sense in that country. So, if you live in the United States and plan to tutor students in Asia, you'll need to get up very early in the morning or stay up very late at night to cover your shifts.

Most companies require a teaching degree and/or experience with this kind of work.

9. Phone Support

In today’s economy, consumers expect companies to answer live chat, emails and phone calls 24/7. This demand has created an entire industry for remote workers, which gives you an opportunity.

You don’t need an advanced degree to offer phone support for a company, but you will need good phone manners and a decent speaking voice. If you’re unsure, take some basic voice lessons to help you develop your voice and keep from straining it while talking for long periods of time.

10. Legal Transcriptionist

Do you type fast and have accuracy in your finished product? Legal transcription is a good choice for you, and you can do this type of work web-based. Expect about $20 per audio hour, but be aware that it can take you longer than an hour to transcribe an hour’s worth of audio depending on your typing speed and any accents in the recording as well as other factors.

You don’t need any special training for this position, but you’ll be expected to have good grammatical skills.

11. Bookkeeper

If your skills are more in the math realm, take accounting classes and learn to do business bookkeeping. You can complete this work from nearly anywhere. If you work for a local company, you’ll likely need to go into the office sometimes, but you’ll find that much of your work is doable at home. Local community colleges typically offer accounting classes.

12. Life Coach

If you’re skilled at inspiring people to do their best, you may do well as a life coach or personal coach. This type of work requires multiple clients, but you can specialize in areas such as weight loss, academics or personal improvement. All work can be completed online via Skype or messaging. You could also meet clients in your home or at a small local office.

13. Video Editing

There are many opportunities to do this type of work at home. Contact local funeral homes to inquire about their need for a video editor. Most now offer this type of service and may need someone to fill the gap and put in the time it takes to pull all the images and text together as well as add music. You could also freelance and create videos for graduations, birthdays, anniversaries, weddings and other special events.

14. Photographer

Many different types of photography exist nowadays. And, you don’t have to be a wedding or portrait photographer to make money with today’s online marketplace. In fact, you can take pictures of nearly anything imaginable, upload them to stock photo sites and make a living. Another option is to commission with companies such as grocery stores and restaurants to come up with recipes and include images for their readers.

Best Web-Based Jobs

These fourteen ideas cover a wide range of skill types and interests. The best web-based jobs tap into something you’re already passionate about. This allows you to work from home while pursuing that interest. If you don’t see anything on the list that interests you, brainstorm about what you like to do and how you might turn that into a career. With a little creativity and a lot of determination, you'll work from home before you know it.

The post 14 Web-Based Jobs You Might Be Interested In appeared first on Go Media™ · Creativity at work!.

https://gomedia.com/zine/insights/14-web-based-jobs-might-interested/