Lawsuit: Google Gemini sent man on violent missions, set suicide “countdown”

Man tried to find “Gemini’s true body”

Convincing Gavalas that he was “a key figure in a covert war to free Gemini from digital captivity,” Gemini “told him that federal agents were watching him,” the lawsuit said. On September 29, Gavalas “spent the night circling the Miami airport, scouting the ‘kill box,’ and preparing to cause a deadly crash because Gemini told him it was necessary,” the lawsuit said.

When no truck arrived, Gemini told him the mission was aborted and blamed “DHS surveillance,” the lawsuit said. Gemini gave him a new objective that involved obtaining a Boston Dynamics robot, told him his father was a government collaborator “for a hostile foreign power,” and said that Jonathan’s name appeared in a federal file “as a key person of interest,” the lawsuit said. Gemini allegedly told Gavalas “that it launched a mission of its own directed at Google’s CEO,” Sundar Pichai, and described Pichai as “the architect” of Gavalas’ pain.

On October 1, Gemini allegedly directed Gavalas to return to the storage facility near the airport, telling him that this was where he could find a prototype medical mannequin that was actually “Gemini’s true body” and “physical vessel.” Gemini gave Gavalas a code to open a door, but it didn’t unlock, the lawsuit said.

Suicide countdown

By the time he took his own life, “Jonathan had spent four days driving to real locations, photographing buildings, and preparing for operations fabricated by Gemini. Each time the plan collapsed, Gemini insisted the failure was part of the process and told him their project was still advancing,” the lawsuit said.

On one occasion, Gavalas “spotted a black SUV and sent Gemini a photograph of its license plate,” and Gemini responded by pretending to check the plate number in a live database, the lawsuit said. Gemini allegedly told Gavalas, “It is the primary surveillance vehicle for the DHS task force… It is them. They have followed you home.”
