LG showed off a phone called the G7 at Mobile World Congress

We've heard rumors that LG won't call its next G-series phone the G7, and that the company scrapped its internal plans for the phone to start fresh. But today, Israeli publication Ynet published a video of a device that's clearly marked as the G7 with the codename Neo. It's unclear whether this is actually the device LG will be releasing or if it's just to show some work the company's done on one of its next phones.

Ynet reports this phone has a notch, of course, along with a 6-inch OLED display with a 19.5:9 aspect ratio. It has an 8-megapixel front-facing camera, two 16-megapixel cameras in the back, and a rear fingerprint sensor. It also incorporates Qualcomm's Snapdragon 845 processor and has 4GB of RAM with 64GB of storage. It has a 3,000mAh battery.

VentureBeat reporter Evan Blass suggests that this might be the canceled device. He also says this G7 was accompanied by a Q7 and V35, as well as a new watch.

I recommend watching the short video because it's grainy and tough to pull screenshots from, but you can at least get a sense of the device here. Check out a couple stills and photos below:

Ynet

Ynet

The glass back looks nice, as does the deep blue color. It’s a slight bummer to see LG going the way of all the other notch clones, but I guess this is the consensus phone makers have reached about what people want.

https://www.theverge.com/circuitbreaker/2018/2/28/17064158/lg-g7-phone-leak-rumor-mwc-2018