Marvel Snap is back in the US

Marvel Snap is back online in the US after access was cut off Saturday night due to the law that banned TikTok and other ByteDance-owned apps. The game's current publisher, Nuverse, is owned by ByteDance.

In a post published Monday evening, the game's developer, Second Dinner, says that it plans to bring "more services in-house" and "partner with a new publisher" to prevent a similar situation from happening again. The same message is also showing up when you play the game, as shown in a screenshot posted on Reddit.

The game is still unavailable on the App Store or Google Play. The Steam listing is still live.

TikTok restored service after about half a day of being offline, though the app is still absent from app stores. President Donald Trump signed an executive order on Monday refusing to enforce the law banning TikTok and other apps owned by ByteDance, The Protecting Americans from Foreign Adversary Controlled Applications Act, for 75 days, but companies still may face risks if they don't follow the law.

https://www.theverge.com/2025/1/20/24348353/marvel-snap-tiktok-ban-back-online