Pinterest’s new round of layoffs comes weeks after its last cuts

The company says its “making organizational changes to further set us up to deliver against our company priorities and our long-term strategy,” according to a statement sent to The Verge by spokesperson Meredith Klein. It did not specify how many employees were being laid off. The people who are losing their jobs will receive “separation packages, benefits and other services,” according to Klein.

We may get a bigger picture of what’s going on at the company on Monday, when it’s set to release its Q4 financials.
