

Tesla Cybertruck deliveries reportedly on hold because the trim is flying off

America's favorite low poly electric truck is facing a new set of problems that don't have anything to do with people spray painting swastikas or crude comments about Elon Musk on them. Deliveries of the Tesla Cybertruck are on hold while the company addresses issues with reports that the trim is becoming detached and flying off, Electrek reports.

Tesla service representatives are telling customers awaiting deliveries that there is a "containment hold" on their trucks, according to several posts in the Cybertruck Owners Forum, as noted by Electrek. The customers are not being told it has anything to do with the vehicle's trim, though. A containment hold is a proactive measure taken by automakers to address a quality issue or defect with a vehicle before it reaches customers.

Electrek also shared a screenshot of direct messages between a customer and a Tesla service rep that mentioned an issue with the truck's cantrail, or the decorative trim that covers the roof ledge above the door. The delay could take several weeks to address, depending on the severity of the loose trim.

The problem is likely related to a handful complaints filed with the federal government earlier this year, which noted that the trim above the truck's windows appeared to be attached by glue.

A video on YouTube posted over a month ago goes into greater detail about the issues with the cantrail trim.

The Cybertruck has been recalled seven times since its official launch December 2023. Tesla sold an estimated 40,000 trucks in 2024, despite over 1 million reservations. There were anecdotal reports of Cybertrucks piling up on used car lots. Tesla Cybertruck factory workers in Austin were told to stay home for three days in December. And since Elon Musk's elevation as a special advisor to the Trump administration, the Cybertruck has become a target of graffiti and vandalism from people opposed to Musk's takeover of the federal government.

<https://www.theverge.com/news/629352/tesla-cybertruck-deliveries-on-hold-loose-trim>