

The Shokz OpenFit Air earbuds are matching their all-time low price

If you like to take your workouts outside, open-ear earbuds are helpful for staying aware of surroundings, but that extra peace of mind often comes at the expense of bass. The Shokz OpenFit Air Earbuds actually try to address that problem, though, and they're currently $79.95 ($40 off) at Amazon, Target, and directly from Shokz – which is their best price to date.

Unlike many of Shokz' other models, the OpenFit Air uses traditional air conduction – similar to a pair of wireless earbuds – instead of bone conduction tech, which results in noticeably decent bass performance. Granted, they still can't match traditional in-ear wireless earbuds, but they at least sound less muddy than a lot of bone conduction alternatives. Ear hooks also keep the OpenFit Air in place, and for the most part they're comfortable (though they can feel less stable when you're donning glasses, as our wearables reviewer found out in her testing).

They've also got decent battery life that lasts six hours on a single charge which is fine for most workouts. Plus, they carry an IP55 rating for sweat and water resistance, so they can withstand sweaty workouts and light rain.

<https://www.theverge.com/gadgets/876392/shokz-openfit-air-earbuds-kobo-clara-colour-deal-sale>