

Twitter Circle may be starting to roll out to more users

Twitter started testing Circle earlier this month with a limited group, and now it looks like it's starting to roll out to more users (via Android Police). The feature works a lot like Instagram's Close Friends, as it allows users to send out tweets to a specific group of people rather than all of Twitter.

Right now, it's unclear how many people currently have access to Circle. It looks like more users (myself included) are finally seeing the feature pop up when they start composing a tweet, but some users still report not having access quite yet. Twitter spokesperson Joseph Nunez told The Verge it's still in testing. "We are still currently testing Twitter Circle with a group of people across iOS, Android and Web globally," Nunez said. "The feature has not rolled out widely to everyone yet as we continue to gather feedback."

To check if you have access to Twitter Circle, update your Twitter app or head to Twitter in a web browser. When you start composing a tweet, you'll see a dropdown menu at the top that reads Everyone. From here, you can choose Twitter Circle to limit your tweet to a select audience, or you can hit Edit to add or remove people from your Circle. Twitter won't notify users if you add or remove them.

2:33

4G 73%

Tweet

Everyone ▾

What's happening?

Choose audience

Everyone

Twitter Circle
1 person

Edit

Choose "Twitter Circle" to limit your tweets.

2:33

4G LTE 73%

← Edit your Twitter Circle

Done

Twitter Circle

Recommended

People won't be notified when you make changes to your Twitter Circle. How it works

The Verge
@verge

Remove

Add or remove users from your Circle.

You can add up to 150 users to your Circle, whether they follow you or not. Users in your Circle will see a note appended to Circle-only tweets (and vice versa), stating: "Only people in @[yourusername]'s Twitter Circle can see this tweet." Tweeting to your Circle is almost like having a private account, only it privatizes certain tweets instead of limiting access to your entire profile.

The people in your Circle won't be able to retweet anything you post to it, but they can still screenshot and download your tweets. It's also important to keep in mind that Twitter's community guidelines still apply even if you're sending your tweets out to a smaller audience.

Update May 28th, 5:27PM ET: Updated to add a statement from a Twitter spokesperson, as well as to reflect that Circle hasn't rolled out to everyone yet.

<https://www.theverge.com/2022/5/28/23145745/twitter-circle-starting-roll-out-more-users>