

YouTube's video player is getting a new look on Android and iOS

YouTube is rolling out a new interface for its mobile app's full-screen player, which should make it easier to like or dislike a video (privately, of course), view comments, and share what you're watching. The old version hid most of those features behind a swipe-up gesture on the "more videos" section, where the new version puts them front and center, relegating related videos to a button in the corner.

The change only shows up when you're watching in full screen – the app looks largely the same when you're watching a video in portrait mode. Doing so, however, used to come with the upside of having easy access to the share button and other controls. Now, you're getting that when watching in landscape view as well.